

I want to go on record against any weakening of the protection now given to Indiana citizens by the Indiana Telephone Privacy Law. Prior to this law becoming effective, every evening was interrupted several times by telephone solicitors - you were a target in your own home. The Indiana law has reduced this nuisance to perhaps once or twice a week. No one has a right to come in my front door and interrupt my dinner in order to try to sell me something. Why should anyone have a right to enter my home electronically for such a purpose. If anything, such solicitations should be completely illegal. I hope the federal government will not act so as to make my dinner table a place of commerce once again. Thank you.

Paul J. Johnson